

RORY WILKIE.

I make AI visuals, and build systems to make them repeatable.

I extract a brand's visual identity and DNA, then build repeatable systems that align with the brand and fit its brand kit, so every asset is immediately recognisable as that brand.

The Meta ads are client work made at Hypervail · everything else is self-initiated

Lemme Live.

A concept advertisement for Lemme Immunity Gummies. The image shows a clear plastic jar of gummies tilted, with several round, orange-colored gummies floating in the air around it. The jar has a white label that reads 'lemme IMMUNITY DAILY WELLNESS GUMMIES' and lists ingredients: 'Vitamin C, D3 & Zinc', 'with clinically studied probiotics', and '40 gummies'. The background is a soft gradient of pink and orange.

How I work

01

Visual identity and DNA, locked first

Before a frame exists, the shoot's visual identity and brand DNA are extracted and locked. Every frame is made against that, so a whole set is recognisably one shoot rather than a run of separate generations.

02

Sheets for anything that has to hold

Products, characters and locations that must not drift are built once as reference sheets: a multi-angle product sheet, a six-panel character sheet, an empty location plate. Every generation pulls from the sheets, never from a description.

03

The reference carries the product

A garment or a belt goes in as a photograph and never gets described in words. The reference already holds the colour, the print and the hardware, and describing it only makes the model redraw it.

04

Real plates where they exist

Where something was actually photographed, the generated material is built to match it rather than replace it. Generative work sits under photography and post, not over the top of them.

05

Written down, so it transfers

Producing weekly to a deadline is what forces a process out of your head and onto paper. Swap the moodboard, the product and the brief, and the same Weavy graph runs the next brand.
